This Month in Military History

Fighting the elements was often more traitorous than the enemy. Life for a soldier during the winter campaigns was particularly trying and monotonous. The cold made every task even harder including the basics of hygiene, cooking, and sleep. Supplies became scarce and sickness was rampant but no matter how bleak, the soldiers always found a way to become hearty in relying on one another for aid, warmth, and moral support. It is often found that the worst of times brings out the best in comradery amongst members in service.
